From the French-Canadian Point of View

Science of Dreaming

The recent studies of figures in dreams is a subject of great interest to psychologists and neurologists. Dreams have long been a source of fascination and mystery, and recent research has shed light on the complexity of this phenomenon. Dreams are not just random sequences of images; they are structured and can be analyzed to gain insights into the workings of the human psyche.

In dreams, certain recurring symbols and motifs often appear. These can include common objects, animals, or even abstract images. Understanding these symbols requires an appreciation of the cultural context in which they occur. For example, in French-Canadian society, certain images may have different meanings than in other cultures.

Recent studies have shown that dreams are influenced by a variety of factors, including our daily experiences, emotional states, and even our physical health. This interplay between the conscious and unconscious mind is a fascinating area of research that continues to evolve.

The French-Canadian perspective offers a unique viewpoint on the interpretation of dreams, as certain cultural and linguistic nuances may affect how these symbols are understood. This cultural perspective is important in understanding the full spectrum of human experience and the complex nature of dreams.
The Doom of Sing Low.

A Chinese Tale of Love and the Tragedy of "The Snow of the Yellow River".

Tawnty years ago Sing Low had been one of the principal characters in the drama of "The Snow of the Yellow River," which was produced at the Chicago Theatre under the management of the celebrated tragedian, who, after his retirement from the stage, became the head of a noted literary society. He had been engaged in the production of the play for many years, and had become well known as an actor and manager. He was a man of pronounced beauty, with a voice that was powerful and expressive. His acting was characterized by a considerable amount of dramatic energy and a strong sense of dramatic truth.
